

I would prefer not to be forced to listen to someone yelling or using abusive language while using the phone when I am in such close proximity to them. I am entitled to peace and quiet within my space and should not be forced to endure abusive situations when I have no ability to move myself, or them, from the area. This already happens far too frequently in other public areas but at least you can move or have the offending party move. Crowded restaurants are a classic example. I've had several situations where some action should have been taken. Yelling, screaming, swearing---very embarrassing to all except the user---naturally. A good test may be to use that as an example. Don't force passengers to endure the additional noise and abusive situations. They can wait the few hours till they land. The only other option would be to provide segregated cabin spaces where calls could be made. A phone booth on aircraft if you will.

Thankyou
